

Looking Back on our 2002 Fantasy Baseball Projections

Projecting the direction of fantasy production year over year on a player by player basis is the core to a successful fantasy season. This core forms the foundation of our service. A service that combines our historically successful mathematical projections model with qualitative insight from our staff of editors which includes first person scouting.

Below is a breakdown of Fantistics 2002 Preseason Baseball Projections. In 2002 we achieved results that are very reminiscent to our 4 year track record of prognosticating. We projected the correct direction as measured by FPI, the most accurate indicator of Fantasy Value (see article comparing FPI to well known Stat indicators), the correct direction, (either up or down) on close to 8 out of 10 MLB batters & close to 7 out of 10 MLB starting pitchers. We believe that projecting the correct direction to a player's production is as valid as any indicator to fantasy success. Now that is not saying that every subscriber is going to have the same fantasy success, as one's fate may have been sealed by selecting several players who did not live up to expectations, sustained production disrupting injuries, or encountered a drop in playing time (something that FPI does not measure).

We look forward to your continued success in 2003.

Grid Explanation: The grids below highlight the relevant FPI (Prior season, 2002 Projection, and 2002 year end actual), and the differences. Column (A-B) compares the prior year's FPI (A) with the Preseason Projection (B). Column (C-A) compares the Actual 2002 final year stat (C) with the prior year (A). If the players fantasy production increased or decreased and matched our projected direction, then we consider that a "Correct" direction with our projection, conversely if the Actual difference is different than the Projected difference, then we were "Wrong" with our projection.
